The creation and name of the modern south coast town of Peacehaven are heavily connected to the events of the First World War.

The town was originally planned as a 'Garden City by the Sea' by its founder, the businessman and entrepreneur, Charles Neville. His aim was to create a town on the South Downs by the sea, where members of the public and ex-soldiers would be able to purchase plots of land upon which they could build homes.

Soldiers had, since the very start of the war, been told that the defence of places like the South Downs was an important reason to volunteer for military service and had been promised 'homes for heroes' when the war came to an end. However, these homes were never built. The breaking of that promise convinced people of the benefits of buying their own land. However, the actual process and evolution of Peacehaven was far more complicated than it might at first appear.

First established in 1916, the name of the town itself was changed several times through a series of competitions run by Neville. During each competition, Neville would choose the winning name and whomever had submitted it would receive £100 (a large amount of money at the time) and a free plot of land to build on. Additionally, the runners up would also receive free plots but would have to pay a £50 fee in order to claim them.

There were 12,500 runner up plots available meaning that those 'runners up' claiming them promised a significant amount of money for Neville. The nature of this competition led to Neville being sued by the Daily Express newspaper, over suggestions that it was a scam. The Express eventually won the lawsuit but by the time they did, the publicity had already ensured that Neville had achieved his goal.

The first name of the town chosen was New Anzac-on-Sea as a tribute to the soldiers from Australia and New Zealand (Anzac stands for the Australian and New Zealand Army Corps) who were fighting overseas. Many of the roads in the town were also to be named after particular battles during the war such as Mons or Tyres. However, it was soon decided that names so linked to death and suffering were not suitable. The term 'Anzac' was viewed as particularly sensitive after the number of Anzac casualties during the battles at Gallipoli. In response, Neville held yet another competition which was won by Ethel Radford from Leicestershire who suggested the name 'Peacehaven'.

For many people who would claim the plots of land, building on them proved to be expensive so, for a time, Peacehaven had no proper layout. In the post-war period, town planners and social commentators would come to regard Peacehaven as embodying many of the worst aspects of Britain at the time. In the following years, Peacehaven would eventually grow into a recognisable town.

The town became further noteworthy for being the point on the south coast through which the Greenwich Meridian Line, which British clocks are set to, enters and exits the country.

Peacehaven remains the only town in the United Kingdom to be named after peace.
